"When you have someone who's been as successful as John has been, there's always a concern that there's suitors out there looking to hire him away. That's always something you have to contend with, but that was not the motivating factor in this decision. Looking from an organizational perspective, it was a matter of what we have and where we want to go, and we felt that John was the right man for the job," Reed said.

2. Defenses figured him out. Kaepernick always had a strong arm, but he lacks touch on short passes.
