How Tottenham a club formed by Christians, with a fan base that even by the most generous estimates probably isn't more than 5 10% Jewish (almost certainly no more than local rivals Arsenal) became, unofficially, at least, the Yids, is a complicated tale filled with as much conjecture as actual fact. But there's no doubt that their identification as such has caused considerable consternation in Britain, where free speech laws are making routine fandom a potentially prosecutable offense. This fall, near the start of the current Premier League season, the Football Association and the Metropolitan Police each announced that the chanting of "Yid" was offensive to some and those who continued doing it could get ejected from a game or even arrested for violating the country's Public Order Act, which prohibits the use of "threatening, abusive or insulting" language.
