Early in the fourth quarter, Freeman was stopped short on fourth and goal from the 1, preserving a 20 3 Saints lead. One play earlier, Julio Jones caught a third down pass with his feet in the end zone, but he was unable to pull the ball across the goal line after reaching back to make the catch and being quickly driven down. Atlanta challenged the spot, but the call on the field was upheld.

Initially, the new team took the same name as their landlords, the Boston Braves, one of the two local baseball teams at the time. The Braves played their first game on October 2, 1932, under the leadership of coach Lud Wray, against the Brooklyn Dodgers, to whom they lost 14 0.[12] The next week, the Braves recorded their first win, beating the New York Giants, 14 6.[13] Despite the presence of two rookies; halfback Cliff Battles and tackle Glen "Turk" Edwards the new franchise's losses during the first season reached $46,000 and Bendix, O'Brien, and Doyle dropped out of the investment, leaving Marshall the sole owner of the Braves.[14][15] The team moved to Fenway Park[16] (home of the Boston Red Sox) the next year, and Marshall changed the name to the "Redskins". A 1933 news article quotes Marshall as saying that he did not name the team specifically in honor of Dietz or any of the team's native members, but because Marshall wanted to avoid any confusion with the Braves baseball squad while still keeping the native connotations of the previous moniker (unlike "Indians", used by another baseball team, no professional sports team at the time was using the name 'Redskins").Γ1 71.
