By 1963, the NFL appointed a special commission to examine the case, but voted 12 2 in favor of continuing to recognize the Cardinals as champions. The lone dissenters were Art Rooney and George Halas, the then owners of the Pittsburgh Steelers and the Chicago Bears, respectively.[3] In 2003, the issue was brought up again during the league's October owners meeting. However, the NFL voted 30 2 not to reopen the case, with the lone supporters being the Pittsburgh Steelers and the Philadelphia Eagles, the league's two Pennsylvania teams.[7] Ironically, Philadelphia's franchise is the direct successor to and is the same franchise (although, in league records, not the same team) as the Frankford Yellow Jackets, the very team that filed the protest that resulted in the ruling in the first anthony johnson jersey place; the Eagles replaced the Yellow Jackets after the latter went bankrupt and ceased operations.
