On November 11, 1999, NASCAR awarded Fox and sister cable channel FX the partial television rights to its races (as part of a four network deal, valued at $2.4 billion, that also included NBC and TBS; the latter's rights were later assumed by TNT) starting with the 2001 season, with Fox and FX alternating coverage of all races held during the first half of the season (NBC and TNT would air all races held during the second half). The deal also included alternating coverage of the preeminent Daytona 500 race, with Fox televising it in odd numbered years and NBC airing it in even numbered years through 2006, with the opposing network airing the Pepsi 400 instead.[11] The rights later extended to sister motorsports oriented cable network Speed Channel in October 2002, when it bought out ESPN's contract to televise the Camping World Truck Series races.
