The only really reliable way to ensure that a large but temporary use of memory DOES return all resources to the system when it's done, is to have that use happen in a subprocess, which does the memory hungry work then terminates. Under such conditions, the operating system WILL do its job, and gladly recycle all the resources the subprocess may have gobbled up. Fortunately, the multiprocessing module makes this kind of operation (which used to be rather a pain) not too bad in modern versions of Python..

On the first Thursday of January 2011, Latitude 30 opened its doors for the first time. If there was any initial worry among Latitude's investors, it dissipated. Brown's mom, Sheri one of Latitude's first corporate employees told me a line stretched around the building on that first night.
