There is a relatively common game situation in which the two point conversion can be an optimal strategy even if its likelihood is somewhat under 50%.[17] In this situation, a team down fourteen points in the final minutes must score two touchdowns while keeping its opponent scoreless in order to tie or win the game. The team could choose to go for two after the first score, because if successful, the team could then kick an extra point following the next score to secure a win. On the other hand, if the two point conversion fails, the team still has a chance to succeed on the next two point conversion to get to fourteen.
