I knew I was not going to play in the first half and was going to play one quarter, the third quarter. So I took the approach of watching specifically what the left guard was doing on every snap. And then when it was my turn to go on the field, I think I was ready.

Description: Deciding how best to introduce this book was the most difficult part of the project. The story was already written for me in the form of a dispassionate diary. All I had to do was organize it, mix in some environmental trappings, sarcasm, a few jokes, send it to a proofreader and, with luck, I could pay the rent.

It is indeed mildly surprising that this landmark centennial moment did not draw even minimal attention in big league circles. Marrero is now baseball's only centenarian among former big leaguers. He is the second oldest known living veteran of professional baseball (trailing Puerto Rico's Emilio "Millito" Navarro by five years).
