The Patriots, in the only statement anyone associated with the team would make on the record for this story, responded to specific questions by saying that there are "several inaccuracies and multiple examples given that absolutely did not occur," though they declined to go into detail. But according to interviews with more than a dozen New England staffers, executives, players and league sources with knowledge of the team's inner workings, the three most powerful people in the franchise Belichick, Brady and owner Robert Kraft have had serious disagreements. They differ on Brady's trainer, body coach and business partner Alex Guerrero; over the team's long term plans at quarterback; over Belichick's bracing coaching style; and most of all, over who will be the last man standing.

I a fan of taking as much luck out of a league set up as possible. You need to be lucky for your players not to get hurt, your good players to play up to expectations, and your bench players to exceed expectations. You need to be lucky for guys to fall to you in your draft, and you need to be lucky to get the guys you want before others do. You need to be lucky week in and week out that your starters out perform their starters, and that you were lucky enough to start the right guys in the right match ups.
